

RATIFICATION OF TRADE TREATIES

PROF. ROMMEL J. CASIS

PROF. ROMMEL J. CASIS: Thank you very much Johaira – my former student, who had a very high grade in my class. Honorable Justice Adolfo Azcuna, Honorable Chief State Counsel Ricardo Paras, Assistant Secretary Eduardo Malaya, Ambassador Claro Cristobal, Undersecretary Manuel Antonio Teehankee, deans, professors, lawyers, students of law, colleagues in government, and friends in the private sector, good morning.

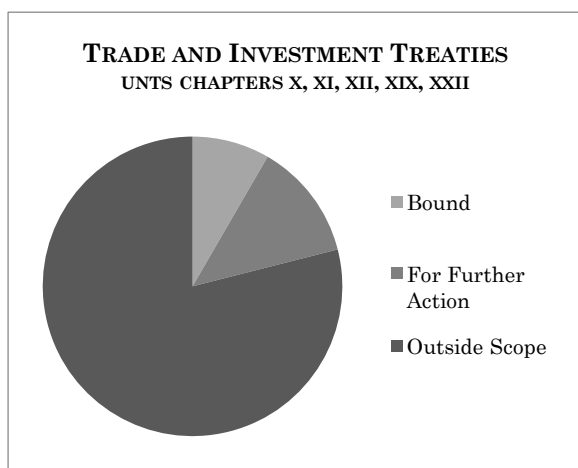

As the third and definitely the least among our eminent speakers today, I have endeavored to keep this presentation short. In keeping with today's general theme of identifying opportunities and challenges for the advancement of Philippine foreign policy priorities, especially those that may often be overlooked, I have been tasked to speak on the topic of international law, and trade and investment facilitation. What I will be presenting to you today is the result of preliminary research by the Institute of International Legal Studies of the U.P. Law Center. We will begin by explaining the methodology we employed in reviewing the Philippines' current, possible and potential obligations under international agreements, which, in turn, became the starting point of our preliminary recommendations.

The first step was to review all 648 multilateral treaties deposited with the United Nations Secretary-General. From these treaties, we identified those falling under certain subject headings, which could potentially enhance trade and investment. These subject headings are trade, transport and communication, navigation, commodities, commercial arbitration. From these subject headings, we identified 347 treaties. These treaties, in turn, were checked to confirm which of them were signed and ratified, signed but not ratified, or not signed by the Philippines. For the treaties that have not been signed, we also determined whether they were still open for accession. From this group of treaties, we compiled a list of those that are recommended for further action by the Philippines.

and investment. The remaining 44 agreements are those possibly open for signing or accession, and relate to trade and investment facilitation. Of this later group, 24 are recommended for possible action.

We were provided with a list of treaties or agreements submitted for concurrence by the Senate, as prepared by the 17th Congress. This was last updated on August 30, 2017. We can imply from this list the areas of priority for the

If we look at this pie chart, we can see that of the 347 treaties under the said subject headings possibly related to trade and investment, 29 are agreements to which the Philippines is already bound, or those which it signed and ratified. On the other hand, 247 of these agreements are those to which the Philippines is not bound, not open for signing and accession, or unrelated to trade government. Thus, the absence of a particular agreement in this list would show that such agreement is not a priority. We noted that none of the 24 agreements we have identified for possible action are in the Senate list. Therefore, our preliminary observation is that some important trade related treaties might have been overlooked. But it is also entirely possible that the executive department, or the Senate, at some point, decided not to become a party to any of these treaties—maybe because these treaties are currently incompatible with current policy. There may be many reasons why these treaties have not been identified in the Senate list. Determining the exact reason for the inattention to these treaties would require further research and assistance from the government agencies concerned and is beyond the scope of this presentation.

Notwithstanding these considerations, we can, at this point, choose a sampling of some of these recommended treaties for initial analysis. We offer three agreements for your consideration. First, the United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods or the CISG. Second, the United Nations Convention on the Use of Electronic Communication in International Contracts or ECC. Third, the Framework Agreement on the Facilitation of Cross-border Paperless Trade in Asia and the Pacific or the FA. We will analyze each of these agreements in the context of the following guide questions: First, “What is the background and the rationale for this agreement?” Second, “What issues related to trade and investment may it address?” Third, “What are the actions needed to comply with this particular agreement?” And fourth, “What are the policy considerations for the DFA in connection with these agreements?”

Let us take a look at the CISG. The CISG was prepared by the UNCITRAL, adopted in Vienna on April 11, 1980, and entered into force on January 1, 1988. As of June 16, 2017, the Convention has been signed by 87 countries,³ the latest being Fiji in 2017, Azerbaijan in 2016, and Vietnam in 2015.

The Philippines is currently not a signatory. Among ASEAN Member States, only Singapore and Vietnam are parties to the Convention.

The purpose of the Convention is to provide a uniform framework for contracts of sale of goods between parties whose places of business are in different states. By doing so, it seeks to remove legal barriers in international trade and promote predictability in international trade law, thus reducing transaction costs.⁴ The CISG applies only to international sales contracts, and therefore the domestic laws still apply to domestic sales contracts. Under the treaty, international transactions are defined as “contracts of sale of goods, between parties, whose places of business are in different States: (a) when the States are contracting states; or (b) when the rules of private international law lead to the application of the law of a Contracting State.”⁵ It also applies only to sales of goods, subject to certain exceptions, and not to sales of services. Moreover, the CISG applies only to sales to businesses, not to sales to consumers. Under Article 2 of the CISG, it is inapplicable to the following: sale of goods for personal use, sale by auction, sale by execution or authority of law, sale of stocks, shares, securities, negotiable instruments and money, sale of ships, vessels, hovercraft or aircraft, and sale of electricity.⁶

Among the benefits of the CISG, as far as trade and investment is concerned, is the provision of a uniform set of rules for international sales of goods. A uniform set of rules may help alleviate some issues in conflict of laws. Given the uniformity, the enforcement of contracts will be easier as the governing law will generally be synchronized across jurisdictions. The CISG also allows parties to opt out of its stipulations in certain cases and specify other laws to govern, which allows it to be flexible.

Cross-border trade will likewise be aided, as transaction costs will be lessened, especially in markets where firms have not yet established experience and expertise. The TMF Group, a consulting body, stated that two of the top challenges of doing business in the Philippines are “trading across borders” and “enforcing contracts.”⁷ The CISG may help address these problems and business uncertainties for firms in new markets.

Moreover, the exporting industry believes that the CISG may reduce barriers to trade and boost exports.⁸ This is because there are opportunities for growth and expansion for global supply chain players that can adapt well to international trade rules. To note, the top destinations for Philippine exports – Japan, United States, China and Singapore – are parties to the CISG.⁹

Aside from these economic benefits, becoming a party to the CISG may also enrich contract law reform. I guess, as an academic, this is something that I find encouraging. Philippine contract law, even those not specifically related to the international sale of goods, may be informed by CISG provisions. On a personal note, I am part of a group of Asian contract law scholars. We meet bi-annually to come up with a harmonized set of rules for contract law in Asia. One of the things I have noticed is that our version of contract law is not in any way updated or consistent with these international rules, whereas my counterparts from other ASEAN countries are able to converse and compare their contract law provisions with the CISG. Unfortunately, when I speak of the Philippine law on the matter, I often have to admit that our rules have not yet been updated to comply with international standards. Furthermore, the CISG comes with a set of tools, such as commentaries and jurisprudence, which will also be available once the Philippines becomes a party to it.

Aside from ratifying the treaty, an option to incorporate the CISG in Philippine law is to amend the Civil Code provisions on sales. Another option is to create a special law or set of rules for transactions covered by the CISG since the Convention does not apply to all kinds of sales. However, we believe that an amendment to the Civil Code is not necessary since the CISG only applies to a specific set of transactions – international sales of goods by business. An implementing legislation may nonetheless be a good idea to avoid confusion. There is also no need for the creation of an implementing agency since the existing government agencies tasked to monitor foreign agreements and trade should suffice. Additionally, the provisions of the Convention do not require reporting obligations for its member states.

In light of the benefits, and the fact that there are a large number of parties to the treaty, we recommend that the executive branch support the accession and ratification of the Philippines to the CISG. Moreover, in the signing and ratification process, further research should be done on the provisions which the Philippines may submit a reservation to, as the CISG allows for reservations. Finally, since the agreement relates to international trade, it would be prudent to engage agencies, such as the Department of Trade and Industry, to assist in the policy-making, signing and ratification process.

The second convention I will be discussing is the United Nations Convention on the Use of Electronic Communications in International Contracts or ECC. It was adopted by the UN General Assembly in 2005. The Convention then entered into force eight years after, on March 1, 2013. The ECC applies to electronic communication in the formation or performance of a contract between parties whose respective places of business are in different states.¹⁰ “Electronic communications” refer to any statement, declaration, demand, notice or request, including an offer and the acceptance of an offer, made by electronic, magnetic, optical, or similar means in connection with the formation or performance of a contract.¹¹ The treaty is intended to be applied broadly, even for arbitration and other legally binding agreements not traditionally considered as “contracts”.¹² Moreover, it excludes certain contracts, such as those for personal purposes, foreign exchange transactions, interbank payment systems, promissory notes, and negotiable instruments, among others.¹³ The ECC does not seek to prescribe a particular form, nor does it require everyone to use or accept electronic communications. It merely provides for rules in case such electronic communications are used in contracts. These provisions, however, may be subject to change by national legislation or by the contract itself. The rules embodied in the ECC are considered “neutral” rules based on the principle of technological neutrality. This means that they do not depend on or presuppose the use of particular types of technology and that they should be applied in the communication and storage of all types of information.

The Philippines signed the ECC on September 25, 2007, but it has yet to ratify it. The ECC recognizes the necessity to provide a legal framework for online contracts, considering the role of electronic communications in accelerated economic growth. Transactions done through the Internet relate to increased firm level productivity,¹⁴ increased Internet access, and facilitate small and medium-sized enterprises, or SMEs, creating more jobs, with digitization generating six million jobs annually.¹⁵ In fact, by 2020, it is projected that about twenty percent (20%) of all jobs will be contracted online.¹⁶ The ECC seeks to address questions of validity of electronic contracts under the principle of functional equivalence. It aims to facilitate paperless means of communication by offering criteria under which they can be functional equivalents of paper documents. It also provides for legislation on electronic communications to those states that have none, or have partial and insufficient provisions.

For the Philippines to comply with the ECC, it may be necessary to amend the current law, Republic Act No. 8792 or the Electronic Commerce Act. The amendments may include updating the rules on the time and place of dispatch of electronic documents, and take into consideration other provisions mentioned in the Convention—but not discussed in our law—such as invitation to make offers, availability of contract terms, and error in electronic communications. Aside from amending the law, it may also be possible to simply update its implementing rules, or issue a new Administrative Order to address the implementation of the ECC. This requires further study and should involve the agencies implementing the law, as well as other stakeholders. For the DFA, we recommend that it consider supporting the ratification of the ECC in order to update Philippine law on electronic commerce and other contracts created, perfected, and performed in cyberspace.

Finally, the third convention is the Framework Agreement on the Facilitation of Cross-border Paperless Trade in Asia or FA. This was developed as part of the implementation of ESCAP Resolution 68/3 entitled Enabling Paperless Trade and Cross-border Recognition of Electronic Data and Documents for Inclusive and Sustainable Inter-Regional Trade Facilitation. The United Nations Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific, or ESCAP, as the regional development arm of the United Nations for the Asia-Pacific Region, endeavors to overcome some of the greatest challenges in the region by providing results-oriented projects, technical assistance, and capacity building for its 53 Member States and 9 Associate Members.¹⁷ The Framework Agreement is not yet enforced, but was open for signature from October 1, 2016 until 30 September 2017 to all ESCAP members. The objective of the Framework Agreement is to facilitate cross-border paperless trade among willing ESCAP member states by providing a dedicated intergovernmental framework to develop legal and technical solutions.

“Cross-border paperless trade” is trade in goods, including their import, export, transit, and related services, taking place on the basis of electronic communications, including the exchange of trade-related data and documents in electronic form.¹⁸ Most of the provisions of the Framework Agreement center on measures for promoting cross-border paperless trade, not on detailed and specific mechanisms for engaging in cross-border paperless trade. The Framework Agreement covers government-to-government, and government-to-business cross-border data exchange. To illustrate, the Framework Agreement encourages the State Parties to establish a national policy framework for paperless trade, to create an enabling law in their respective national legal systems, and to establish the respective national committees to promote a legally enabling domestic environment for exchange of trade-related data and documents in electronic form. It differs in its nature and coverage from other regional initiatives, such as those of ASEAN and APEC. Compared with ASEAN, which is focused on developing an ASEAN single window, a specific mechanism, the Framework Agreement provides a framework for States to follow through paperless trade, and not a single system. Moreover, ASEAN is limited to its 10 members, but the Framework Agreement is open to all 53 Member States of the ESCAP. As compared with APEC, whose activities are conducted on the basis of non-binding commitments, the Framework Agreement is a binding UN Treaty. APEC covers only 21 States and there exists no initiative among them for a regional agreement for cross-border paperless trade.

	FA	ASEAN Single Window	APEC
▪ Trade regulation sought to be implemented	Facilitation of paperless trade involving trade in goods and exchange of trade-related data	Facilitation of trade through electronic exchange of cargo clearance data in a synchronized environment	Various trade commitments
▪ Nature of agreement	Binding UN Treaty	Binding only among ASEAN Member States	Non-binding
▪ Area of implementation	53 Member States	10 Member States	21 Member States

On the other hand, the Framework Agreement is complementary to the WTO Agreement on Trade Facilitation (TFA). Implementing the Framework Agreement will support ESCAP member States in easily meeting the requirements of many provisions of the WTO TFA, including those on formalities and trade of goods, release and clearance of goods, and border-agency cooperation. The Framework Agreement addresses the necessity for a bilateral or sub-regional intergovernmental approach since this encompasses all 53 states of the region. It also provides a solution to high trade costs. According to implementation reports, the potential total direct cost savings across all trade would be approximately US$1 billion annually for partial reform and US$7 billion annually for full implementation.¹⁹ It also aims to shorten the time consumed by facilitating trade and therefore boosts trade.

¹⁹ Estimating the Benefits of Cross-Border Paperless Trade, UNITED NATIONS ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COMMISSION FOR ASIA AND THE PACIFIC 24 (2014), <http://www.unescap.org/sites/default/files/Benefits%20of%20Cross-Border%20Paperless%20Trade.pdf>.

There had been issues regarding parties that have different implementation levels and levels of readiness for trade facilitation. The Framework Agreement affords flexibility according to the level of readiness while allowing its objectives to be met.

As recommended by the Framework Agreement, the Philippines will have to enact an enabling law that would allow cross-border paperless trade with other States. Once the international standards on trade have been identified, they must be adopted and incorporated in the enabling law. Most likely, these standards will refer to periods for data exchange, as well as the data that will have to be exchanged, and forms of contracts and documents evidencing such data. Since the Framework Agreement applies to both government-to-government and government-to-business transactions, cooperation between public and private sectors must also be developed.

For policy direction, we recommend that the DFA facilitate the signing and ratification of this agreement. To implement the FA will, however, entail a huge endeavor. It requires an enabling legislation and the formation of committees and other bodies. Pursuant to the process of ratification, we also recommend that all the relevant government agencies be involved.

In conclusion, our purpose here today is to make an initial assessment of trade-related treaties the Philippines may want to consider ratifying. We cannot offer at this time an in-depth discussion of these treaties. We merely provide a sampling of what may be available for consideration. It seems that there are a number of treaties that are currently being considered by the Government, possibly for a variety of reasons. We, at the Institute of International Legal Studies, believe that the situation merits further study to ensure that we are not missing out on opportunities for growth. Thank you very much for listening.

Colleagues, we are honored and pleased to have with us today, Undersecretary Manuel Antonio Teehankee of the DFA Office for International Economic Relations.

COMMENTARY BY
UNDERSECRETARY MANUEL ANTONIO J. TEEHANKEE

USEC. MANUEL ANTONIO TEEHANKEE: Justice Leonen: Justice Azcuna, my good friend from DOJ days Chief Paras, of course, Asec. Ed, fellow traveler in this never ending push for international law interest group in the Philippines; dear friends, magandang hapon sa inyong lahat.

Since we are trying to push forward the open forum, I do have some brief remarks and reports, but is Attorney Raul Angeles here already? Is there a representative from the Board of Investments (BOI)? Any volunteer for the BOI? Anyway, I will briefly report and I thought we are following this forum style, so I will ask Professor Casis not to be so far away since there are only two of us in the open forum. Well, we are trying to follow international practice and make it very interactive, so with the absence of one speaker, we will have more time, especially with the presence of our justices here and all of you to interact. Since I have been in OUIER, I am very pleased to report some developments in international economic law. I really am very, very pleased that I am speaking after Professor Casis, since this is one of our subjects to have an inventory of treaties pending ratification or pending signature. Since I am also very pleased to only be dealing with economic, I am also very happy that we are speaking after the excellent presentation of the political treaties and agreements in the first session.

So, definitely, one of our very positive experiences with OLA and OUIER in the DFA is really the importance of getting treaties in force. And this is the big issue: how to get the treaties in force especially since a lot of legal time, billable hours if you were in private practice, but government bureaucratic time, which is also very important, is put into the negotiation process. And sometimes, negotiations can literally take years. And so when, after several years of work, the treaty is indeed signed, and so for it to be enforced, you have to proceed to having it ratified by the President, and having it concurred in by the Senate. However, as pointed out by the main presenter, some treaties are sitting there for many years. So we do have a proposal that it is very, very important, that the private – the international law interest group such as the academe present here, government, and also the private practitioners, get into the picture. Because in order to get a treaty in force, it requires a whole set of departmental concurrences. You cannot imagine the amount of rush work we had to get for the very positive passage of the following. At least over the last year and a half of my time in OUIER, OUIER is just the acronym for the Office of the Undersecretary for International Economic Relations, and OLA is the acronym for Ed's department. And of course we are very, very happy that Ed is back because he is an academic scholar and actually, theoretically should be permanently checking on OLA, with all due respect to our OLA colleagues here.

So, over the last year through some personal and senatorial or departmental prodding and reminding, we did get completion of the ITA, that's the Information Technology Agreement Supplemental Protocol. So that's in the WTO. As pointed out, we did work on the ratification of the Trade Facilitation Agreement which entered into force just this February this year. And so, I see of course the tight commission of friends. It really requires a whole set of governmental activation of the bureaucracy to get all these departmental concurrences, get them into a package care of OLA, then get them to the Office of the President. You must do the follow-up because, as what happened with the Paris accord, it was already at the Office of the President, but without follow-up, the election happened and then, guess what? We had to redo all the Cabinet concurrences, you cannot imagine. So it was already ready in the Office of the President, they didn't, thanks to Senator Legarda, who you all know is an advocate, we got things done and we had to follow-up in each Department. So that's the second one that was rushed and followed up, the Paris accord. So the Philippines was caught up and is part of the Paris accord.

Then we had also another economic treaty, the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank (AIIB) Agreement which was also, the impetus of course, was that the President was going to China. We had reservation subscription, we were given VIP treatment, we own one percent (1%) of AIIB. The money was all set, a hundred million dollars, it's all set. So can you imagine if we did not get the full ratification, the set aside hundred million dollars will lapse because we offer it now on post-PDAF requirements of strict COA requirements and that would have lapsed, and the money would have not been used and then we would have to go through a whole appropriation process. So that was also good news, fast, and we are priority one percent (1%) owners of the AIIB, not, in the World Bank and other financial institutions. We have very, very tiny optionalities but the good part is, because we sent the money in, we ratified, we are a major stockholder.

We also have this Apostille Convention, good news from OLA, because that is very important for our economic agreements as pointed out per OLA. It is pending at the Office of the President already. Of course, it took Ed Malaya's attention and intergovernmental, because in government we all have to help each other, so it is a good collegiality of working with other government offices. Do not nag them, just friendly follow-up, eventually they will deliver. Because it is all really very collegial in the government service. We have signed the EFTA, which is the second free trade agreement of the Philippines, the first being with Japan. This one is technically a free trade agreement but with four non-EU countries, emphasis non-EU, so it is not a controversy, Switzerland, Lichtenstein, Norway, and Iceland. So this is also almost done, again thank you to OLA, because it's a whole legal process, you know how lawyers are, of assembling a package for Malacañang and that is pending now for the President's ratification, similar to the Apostille Convention. And after that you must follow-up at the Senate and make sure that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, that's its job, and you have contact with the Senators, and then the report must be put out for the full session concurrence. So we are watching out for two very positive developments – EFTA and Apostille for monitoring with the Senate. And of course, you know that the Senate operates in various sessions and so you must make sure the ratification, I'm sorry the concurrence, must occur within a certain time frame.

Going back to practicality, I think, I can only give my 300% support to the idea of an annual Colloquium such as this because it gives the DFA the opportunity to interact with the academe, other government agencies, and private international law practitioners to push forward indeed what are very current events happening in the international law area, and which are time sensitive, especially in the international economic field. Most international economic agreement or treaties have the so-called momentum effect of, once signed, it generates investments and trade, and new deals within a span of two to three years. And that's why in the economic front, we work closely with DTI on ensuring ratification within a relatively short time, because in the international economic field, the momentum for new investment and new trade is very close to the date of the deal. Of course, Apostille Convention, digital paper and all that, we should push for more, but that is why we need – it is not as time sensitive but it is important that the private sector does, and the other agencies in the academe.

So we do have a kind of rating proposal wherein the importance of the pending treaty should be scaled on a one to ten basis with three factors. The first factor, is of course, whether the Philippines has already signed, and the years pending. So if it is signed like the 2007 ECC, signed and already pending for eight years, ten years, so ten years and already signed – of course, if there's any controversy, that's minus 5, okay. So on a scale of 1-10, assuming that it is non-controversial, assuming this is non-controversial, it gets a ten or one-third, three, three point three (3.3).

Then, the second one is whether it is accepted already. There is an overall international consensus among the international law practitioners. So I suppose there are two examples – one, it gets a really high priority, but on the digital one, which is only open for signature, of course, it gets already, it is not signed so it does not get points in the A Level. But on the second one, one Convention is higher, higher priority because of the consensus. For example, the Apostille Convention gets a very, very high score because it has reached international level of acceptance. And of course, to the international law experts in the room, a level of customary international law, while there is instant custom, there is still the general acceptability of international acceptance of a custom.

The third factor that we would recommend for our monitoring during our Colloquium is the status of the endorsement and what sector is involved. And here I think while the government is sometimes behind, we have the A and B, but in C, it is very important that the treaty that is pending for signature or concurrence or ratification receives the endorsement of the international law interest groups, which of course we are trying to make sure are Philippine Society of International Law, all the international law centers are more active, so we really need positive championing by the sector involved. And of course, this includes, for example, the DTI if it is a trade agreement, if it is intellectual property we need the endorsement of the Intellectual Property Office and the DOST. So in the third factor, we really need the private practitioner groups who are supporting that particular Convention. I can report the very, very positive influence of the Philippine Chamber of Commerce and Industry. They have been following up on the Apostille Convention, so that is both the Chamber of Commerce and private practitioners. They are also following up on the Islamabad Convention. So very important to, kind of adopt, adopt your treaty or adopt your Convention, so that they can be put forward in the priority list. So without much further ado, I am very glad to give you that partial report in the economic area. So, congratulations and I hope this will continue on an annual basis. Then we can have the University of the Philippines provide a clear matrix with some priorities. They gave us plenty of treaties right away to follow up on. I am sure that your office will be very upset given the amount of work your office has to do to compile documents for a treaty. Maraming salamat po.

OPEN FORUM

ATTY. WAHAB-MANANTAN: Thank you very much Usec. Teehankee. Now we proceed to the Open Forum. As usual, we request you to please identify yourself and the office that you come from for the proceedings. Yes, sir?

COMMISSIONER ALBANO: To just follow through on Amb. Teehankee's presentation. I am Commissioner Albano of the Tariff Commission. I observed that we have so many things in the process and my observation is that there has to be a personal champion of a certain treaty, like the IPA where to because there is this person who really saw to it that it gets through the process. Like even this Convention on Intellectual Property. Is there somebody, a person, who is championing it? That's very important. As I observed, the way we got things done many times in the economic field is that there is a personal champion of this particular treaty that has to go through the bureaucracy. So that is just in addition to the comment that has been made by Amb. Teehankee. Thank you.

ATTY. CEMBRANO-MALLARI: Okay, so we can have two or three more questions and then the panel will answer them. Yes Ma'am?

MS. ROSARIO LABORTE-CUEVAS: Good morning. I'm Rosario Laborte-Cuevas from the Department of Justice. I would like to commend and thank Professor Casis for his in-depth presentation, especially on the CISG and the ECC. I am interested in these two Conventions because the Office of the Chief State Counsel is also working closely with the UNCITRAL Regional Center for Asia and the Pacific. And we have been pushing for the Philippines to sign the CISG. As early as 2009, the Department has already endorsed it to the DFA UNIO for the Philippines to sign the CISG.

PANELIST: Bakit sa UNIO (Why UNIO)?

MS. LABORTE-CUEVAS: Kasi po ang UNIO ang nag-request (Because it was UNIO that requested) for the Department to make a comment and its recommendations on the CISG. And in 2013, actually the UNCITRAL Regional Center Representatives, even came in and gave a seminar to the agencies of the Department. And the conclusion of that forum is that everybody is for the Philippines to sign the CISG. And we are only waiting for the DFA. Sorry for that information, Sir. But we are awaiting the action of UNIO on that. And because of our close coordination with the Department of Trade and Industry (DTI)-Export Management Bureau, during the last meeting with the UNCITRAL ARCAP in BPI this year, we were advised by DFA to revive the push for the CISG. With regard to ECC, because it is also an instrument under the UNCITRAL, the DOJ is in close coordination with the DTI E-Commerce of DTI and they have also been following up with the DFA for the ratification. Because, yes, we have signed it in 2007 and as per the DTI E-Commerce Office, they have been following it up with DFA on the ratification. Apparently, because of the change of administration, I think the papers for the ratification are missing. So maybe we can just revive the process for its ratification.

ATTY. CEMBRANO-MALLARI: Thank you very much, Ma'am. One more question please or one more comment?

PROF. ROMMEL CASIS: Okay, just a quick response to the comments. I agree that we need champions to continue the follow-up. But I think instead of just having a person being the champion, I think we really need an institution that is continuous. Because we have expiration dates so it would be best to have an institutional memory and continuity. And I am sure the DFA-OLA under Ambassador Malaya is committed to this. He has been very dynamic and energetic discussing with us. And also I guess to commit the Institute of International Legal Studies, also of the U.P. Law Center. Perhaps, also working with the IBP to continue working on this by coming up with I guess what Ambassador Teehankee also mentioned, a database, a list to make sure that no treaty falls through the cracks and by acting as a coordinating body or arm to help our already overworked colleagues in government service. Just to give them gentle reminders of certain things that remain pending. And we are glad to support our colleagues in government in that way.

USEC. TEEHANKEE: So, on the CISG, I still remember this from my law school days, that it was positively endorsed in so many legal articles. So I think the colloquium today passes by acclamation of hands that we should sign it. Yes, can we hear a sound of yes?

AUDIENCE: Yes!

USEC. TEEHANKEE: Okay so the next question is, in all these treaties, there has to be a lead department. Is there a lead department? Baka DOJ? Anyway, that's the big question always in the ratification process. In climate change, DENR was head together with a senator and they were reminding each other. But I think for CISG, do we have a lead? Is it DOJ? Chief Paras, DOJ ba 'yon? Okay, so all we will need is a joint signed letter from the two cabinets—secretaries addressed to Sec. Cayetano. Because this is a signature, it is not a ratification, CISG's signature. We need to sign it. So it is not a simple thing for OLA to receive. So good news for OLA here, hindi kayo ang taya. Because for signature, you need special powers and there has to be a lead cabinet minister who will sign the CISG. So we will expect that application for special powers to be sent to our office, and if that is done, we will definitely fully endorse. But that one process for signature is a slightly different process and then for ratification and concurrence, we definitely will just need a follow-up endorsement together with the COC from the Department. Now, if the one following up is a private academe, they have to get the follow-up with the lead cabinet because, first and foremost, the certificate of concurrence of that lead cabinet department must be in place. Then we will send out requests for COCs from all other cabinets. So I think maybe as a project, since it is for signature and it is the initial colloquium of the DFA-OLA, maybe CISG could be the first project for a signature process because I think it is really overdue ang CISG so I think that can be a benchmark. Thank you.

ASEC. EDUARDO MALAYA: Atty. Celeste, if I may just add something to what Usec. Dondi had mentioned. It was mentioned by our friend from the DOJ that the DOJ was working with DFA UNIO on the CISG and so just to have additional collaborators on this matter, I would recommend that when there are communications on international economic treaties, please rope in the office of Usec. Dondi Teehankee. It is their office which has the primary competence on the subject. And with respect to the Electronic Commerce Convention, when we signed it in 2007 there was already a consensus to join in. So it is a matter of doing the necessary follow-through.

And in fact, I am surprised that we have not done the follow-through, and I think that this matter underscores the value of our Colloquium. Most of us are meeting for the first time as a group and comparing notes and exchanging recommendations. This validates the important role that this Colloquium is doing and can do moving forward.

I also would like to mention an update on the Apostille Convention which Professor Beth, Justice Azcuna, and Usec. Dondi Teehankee referred to—very simple convention and yet so crucial in facilitating the recognition of foreign documents. DFA-OLA prepared the ratification papers and submitted them to the Office of the President months ago, and we are hopeful that the President would sign it soonest. We hope to see a lot more of these low-hanging fruits just by working together.

ATTY. CEMBRANO-MALLARI: Not only is this an opportunity for us to learn from our speakers on the state of international law in relation to our foreign policy priorities, but also is a platform to widen and strengthen partnerships among law and foreign service practitioners who work on these issues. Thus, it is the organizers' hope that today's activity will spur continued engagements and perhaps even the institutionalization of such engagements in the future as a means to enforce the Philippines' position in shaping international law. To facilitate the attainment of this goal, we have asked key persons from various institutions and organizations engaged in international law and Philippine foreign policy issues to introduce their groups and discuss their work. We now invite them on the stage for their brief presentations. Kindly come up to the stage as your names are called. Atty. Romel Bagares of the Philippine Society of International Law, Atty. Andre Palacios of the newly established International Law and International Affairs Committee of the Integrated Bar of the Philippines, and Atty. Jeremy Gatdula from the University of Asia and the Pacific to discuss the work of the Philippine Council on Foreign Relations.

UPDATES:
PHILIPPINE YEARBOOK OF INTERNATIONAL LAW
(University of the Philippines Law Center)

ATTY. CEMBRANO-MALLARI: According to the program, the first presenter is myself, so please allow me to introduce myself. I am Celeste Cembrano-Mallari, I work as a law education specialist at the Institute of International Legal Studies of the U.P. Law Center. I am supposed to present to you updates on the Philippine Yearbook of International Law. But before I do so, please allow me to give you a brief information about the office where I come from, the Institute of International Legal Studies. The Institute of International Legal Studies or IILS is one of the five institutes constituting the U.P. Law Center. The U.P. Law Center is the research and extension arm of the U.P. College of Law. The U.P. College of Law and the U.P. Law Center are collectively known as the U.P. Law Complex. The Institute of International Legal Studies has a specific mandate to undertake research and extension functions in international law, comparative law, international relations, and foreign policy, specifically in areas that affect the Philippines. Pursuant to this mandate, the Institute conducts regular research programs which can be undertaken either by an individual or by a group of international law experts to address a specific international issue that would affect the Philippines. With respect to our extension programs, we have conferences and seminars. We also issue regular publications, among which is the Philippine Yearbook of International Law.

To give you a brief background on the Philippine Yearbook of International Law, this was formerly known as the Philippine International Law Journal. And this was originally published by the Philippine Society of International Law which Atty. Romel Bagares will discuss later on. In 1966, the first issue of the Philippine Yearbook of International Law as we know it now was released. And in 1975, the Law Center became its home through a joint undertaking of the Philippine Society of International Law and the U.P. Law Center to publish the Yearbook. This was intended to serve their common objectives of promoting studies, research, and discussions in the field of international affairs. However, as Asec. Malaya said earlier, more than twenty-five years have passed since its last publication and indeed there is a need to restore the Yearbook for the following purposes: first, to provide information on Philippine foreign policy; and second, to serve as a source book for lawyers on developments in international law relevant to their respective practices. Upon the urgings and encouragement of Asec. Malaya, with the cooperation of the Philippine Society of International Law, the Institute initiated movements to revive the Yearbook beginning in 2017.

The Yearbook will cover international agreements entered into by the Philippines, Philippine laws, DOJ opinions, and judicial decisions that have implications to Philippine foreign policy. Proceedings of national conventions, conferences on international law such as this one, the academic papers from international law experts, and other materials relevant to international law and Philippine foreign relations will also be included upon the discretion of the editorial committee. We have invited Dean Merlin M. Magallona as our editor-in-chief and he gave us his commitment to be our editor-in-chief. Thank you, Dean. The associate editors will be the director of the Institute of International Legal Studies, Prof. Rommel Casis, and the President of the Philippine Society of International Law, Harry Roque.

For your queries, clarifications, or if you wish to contribute academic papers, or if you simply want to update us with the things that we need to know, or you consider that we need to include in the Yearbook, please do not hesitate to e-mail us at iils.uplaw@gmail.com with the subject heading: Philippine Yearbook. Thank you very much and we hope to hear from you soon.

Now may I proceed to the next speaker, Atty. Romel Bagares of the Philippine Society of International Law.

UPDATES: PHILIPPINE SOCIETY OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

ATTY. ROMEL BAGARES: Good afternoon to everyone. My presentation will be in two parts. The first one will be a brief historical note on the Philippine Society of International Law (PSIL) and the second will be about a major international conference that we will be hosting in Manila in 2019.

As to the latter, I am referring to the 7th biennial conference of the Asian Society of International Law (ASIAN SIL), which the PSIL will co-sponsor with the Department of Foreign Affairs, among other key institutions in the country.

 Mr. Bagares, a founding member of the revived Philippine Society of International Law, heads the secretariat of the National Planning Committee for the ASIAN SIL Biennial Conference in 2019 in Manila. An alumnus of the UP College of Law and the Vrije Universiteit Amsterdam, he is a lecturer in public international law at the Lyceum of the Philippines University and Executive Director of the Center for international Law-Philippines. This is an edited version of his remarks at the DFA's inaugural colloquium.

Justice Feliciano and the Founding of the Philippine Society of International Law

On to my first point. The Philippine Society of International Law was incorporated on September 27, 1961 under the leadership of an illustrious Filipino legal luminary we all know, the late Justice Florentino Feliciano. Its legal formation followed its inaugural meeting held some five months earlier, on May 24, 1961.

Justice Feliciano would lead the PSIL's Executive Council from 1961 to 1989, and serve as its President from 1975 to 1983.

We know about the founding of the PSIL because it was actually reported in a newsletter of the American Society of International Law, whose Executive Council also had Justice Feliciano as a member from 1987 to 1990. So the PSIL could very well be one of the very first professional associations established in the name of international law in the Asian region (India having established its own society of international law in 1959), and quite possibly, the first of its kind in the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN).

The PSIL's crowning jewel was the Philippine Yearbook of International Law, an annual roundup of articles on international law from Philippine international law experts. The PYIL came out with its inaugural issue in 1966, according to archival data. The PSIL was sole publisher from 1966 to 1974; in 1975, the UP Law Center became its co-publisher, and the latter's Institute of International Legal Studies as institutional secretariat. The Yearbook would have a 15-volume run, with the last one published in 1989.

My archival research shows that in 1988, the PSIL held a meeting at the Presidential Palace, with President Corazon Aquino as host and guest speaker. It appears to be the last professional meeting organized by the PSIL.

Revival of the Philippine Society of International Law in 2014

Given its illustrious history, and the contemporary challenges we face today as a nation, it seems fitting that we had been able to revive the PSIL, and along with it, the PYIL. A principal difficulty we faced was its lapsed registration with the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC). As you know, the SEC has strict rules on this matter, but the leadership of Secretary Teresita Herbosa, seeing what the PSIL was about, allowed us to revive it in 2014 under the same name, although most if not all of its founders were no longer around.

Why do we need to revive the PSIL?

For one, for a long time, we did not have a functioning professional association of lawyers, judges, academics and students dedicated to the field of international law. It's a crime that a country with important contributions to the development of international law in Asia has had no such venue for intellectual and professional engagement, not to mention that our top law schools have been given a good account of themselves by winning in various international law competitions abroad. We also now have a significant number of Filipino lawyers who have done graduate studies in international law from the world's top universities.

Too, international law has become more than a passing academic interest today, with raging issues like the Philippine claim over certain portions of the South China Sea hogging newspaper headlines in the country on a daily basis. Of course, there is also the increasing integration of our regional economies under the ASEAN system – and it is one that will require greater familiarity with transnational and international legal processes from Filipino lawyers.

Another practical reason is that – and I will now move on to my next point – the ASIANSIL has been egging on its Filipino membership to host its biennial conference for the longest time.

But for that, we need to have a local chapter as principal host. That we cannot do without a Philippine chapter already up and running. The practical thing to do was re-establish an organization that historically, has led professional and academic efforts in the country towards the promotion of the study of international law.

The Philippine Society of International Law and the Asian Society of International Law

As you know, during the founding meeting of ASIANSIL in Singapore in 2007, several Filipino academics were in attendance, and became members of its founding Executive Council. I'm talking here of Dean Merlin Magallona, Associate Justice Francis Jardeleza, International Criminal Court Judge Raul C. Pangalangan, and Prof. H. Harry L. Roque, Jr.

And so, at the 6th Biennial Conference in Seoul, South Korea, last August, Prof. Roque – now the spokesperson for the President of the Republic of the Philippines – was elected president of the ASIANSIL. In addition, Justice Jardeleza was elected Vice President for Southeast Asia while Judge Pangalangan was re-elected as a member of the Executive Council.

In May this year, the revived Philippine Society of International Law will have its annual membership meeting. We hope to see many of you join the ranks of its membership. It's inaugural Board of Trustees at its revival count among its members Ambassador Manuel Teehankee (who spoke earlier), Judge Pangalangan, Dean Sedfrey Candelaria, Dean Magallona and Secretary Roque. We're happy to say the PSIL's inaugural meeting in 2014 also saw the attendance of professors of international law from outside Metro Manila, especially Dumaguete City and Cebu.

ASIANSIL's 7th Biennial Conference: Manila 2019

By tradition, the country holding the presidency of the Society also hosts the biennial conference. But we wouldn't be so bold as to accept the presidency if we did not have the Department of Foreign Affairs' assurances that they will throw their full support behind the Philippines' bid to host the 7th biennial conference in Manila sometime in August 2019.

We are doubly grateful to the DFA, under the leadership of Assistant Secretary J. Eduardo Malaya of the Office of Legal Affairs, because it is also the prime mover behind the republication of the PYIL, with the UP Law Center as a partner institution.

ASIANSIL is now a well-established academic and professional organization, and certainly a force to reckon with – given that three members of the International Court of Justice are from the Asian region, and various international tribunals are either headed by Asians or have a marked Asian presence (as seen for example in the case of the International Criminal Court and the International Tribunal on the Law of the Sea).

It also publishes the Asian Journal of International Law, which has also acquired, in such a short time, a reputation as a top-of-the mind academic and professional publication, published by the Oxford University Press no less.

Incidentally, at the 6th biennial conference of the ASIANSIL in Seoul, Korea last year, Justice Feliciano – along with Professor R.P. Anand (India), Judge Wang Tieya (China), and Judge C.G. Weeramantry (Sri Lanka) – was recognized by the Society for his pioneering contributions to international law as an Asian. His legacy and those of his fellow awardees were honored through the inaugural Paik Choong-Hyun Prize, established to honor the memory of Professor Paik Choong-Hyun (1938-2007), who was Professor of International Law at Seoul National University, Korea (1968-2004).

We hope to rally the support of other key government, professional and business organizations in the country for this very important gathering. I am told by Dean Magallona, who is here with us, that the PSIL itself had corporate sponsorships for its activities. We need that for the 7th ASIANSIL Biennial conference in Manila in 2019.

And the proposed theme is this – “Rethinking the Foundations of International Law, Finding Common Solutions to Civilizational Issues from an Asian Perspective.” I understand it’s very kilometric but it was approved by the ASIANSIL Executive Council in Seoul, along with the Concept Note that we prepared with Dean Magallona. In any case we have two years to find a good shorthand for the long title.

I will now read the Concept Note for your edification:

The past is always relevant to our common future/s. International law may very well have had a murky beginning in Asia – closely intertwined as it has been with the colonial project – there is no question that Asian societies have embraced it, even for purposes distinct and separate from its original impulses. As a platform for cooperation in many areas, it has proven its usefulness, the contentious aspects notwithstanding.

Contemporary developments in international relations, shifts in global, regional and national politics, as well as large-scale environmental and economic issues, now compel a reexamination of the foundational roots of international law, especially as these raise civilizational issues. For example, the horrific spectre raised by a new breed of radical terrorists in the mould of ISIS has raised a common issue to humanity and challenges exceptionalist notions of culture-based norms and rights on what it means to be human and to be a rights-bearer.

East and West, North and South, the question of human dignity has become front and center in the raging debate on the meaning and continuing relevance of human rights; this in fact, should take us back to the discussions on the ontological or civilizational sources from which the drafters of the UN Charter drew in their difficult and gargantuan work.

And what of the UN in relation to Asia, the most diverse of regions in the world? As a leading, if dominant feature of the international legal order, the UN and the different corollary international legal institutions it has spawned have demonstrated both vertical and horizontal features that have a bearing on an Asian embrace of international law.

In the global issue of environmental degradation – on many levels a real civilizational threat – Asia has moved forward, with China choosing to work with the European Union in implementing the Paris Protocol in the face of American retreat. And environmental problems are no abstract problem in many Asian societies.

The hegemony of Western-style business and investments also now find stiff competition in Chinese-led international banking and investments, and the new Silk Road economic highway proposed by China that makes inroads in areas traditionally occupied by state sovereignty and extant regional economic arrangements.

The Philippines has found itself at the crossroads of these developments with the election into office of President Rodrigo Roa Duterte, who has made as one of the cornerstones of his government an independent foreign policy that steers closer to China and Russia as never before, without cutting ties with the traditional American hegemon, as well as a populist approach to governance that presents a counter-intuitive, if contrapuntal view to human rights commitments.

His friendly overtures to China has likewise disrupted what other stakeholders have hoped would be a singular and steady trajectory for the Philippines in connection with the Permanent Court of Arbitration's ruling in the South China Sea Arbitration initiated by his predecessor.

Uncertainties in the contemporary times may mean disabling perplexities. But it may also be embraced as a necessary search for common solutions to the common problems faced by diverse cultures and societies, by way of rethinking what international law had stood for from the beginning and how it may be made relevant to contemporary challenges.

So that's our Concept Note. That's very Dean Magallona, you agree?

As in Seoul, there will be a junior scholars' conference before the biennial meet itself, with junior academics from all over the world expected to participate in the sessions. We hope to match, if not exceed, the Seoul junior conference attendance, which drew at least 150 graduate and postgraduate students and junior academics.

In Seoul, there were a few Filipinos, including, if I recall correctly, a group from De la Salle University and four or five students from UP who read papers at the conference, plus a couple of Filipino graduate students from Hongkong University. Anyway Secretary Harry was very happy that it was just a small group so he did not have to pay much when he hosted a dinner for us later – with the check amounting to only around a hundred thousand Korean won!

But I think that also underscores the need for more and more Filipino lawyers and academics taking part in such state-of-the art conferences. We do need to keep abreast of the latest developments in international law. We intend to draw up a conference with many points of interest for Filipino lawyers, as the target conference attendance is at least 400 local and foreign delegates. We also intend to have a special panel in honor of the legacy of Justice Florentino Feliciano. We hope to tackle these and other matters when the academic committee of the National Planning Committee for the 7th Biennial Conference meets in the next week or so.

The conference proper will have at least 40 panels on various academic and professional topics. We would like to hold the opening session at the University of the Philippines, so we are considering nearby hotels like SEDA Hotel at Vertis North or the Novotel at the Araneta Center, among other hotels of similar standards, as the main conference venue.

There is also an inter-sessional conference between the biennial conferences. This year's inter-sessional meet will be in Beijing at the Renmin University. Further details may be accessed through the ASIANSIL website, where you may also check out other details about the ASIANSIL's many activities.

I see that my time is up. Thank you very much.

ATTY. CEMBRANO-MALLARI: Thank you very much, Atty. Bagares. We now proceed to Atty. Andre Palacios of the International Law and International Affairs Committee of the Integrated Bar of the Philippines.

UPDATES:
IBP INTERNATIONAL LAW AND INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE, INTEGRATED BAR OF THE PHILIPPINES

ATTY. ANDRE PALACIOS: A pleasant afternoon to our government officials and officers, to members of the academe, and to those in the private sector like myself. So I am a member of the Integrated Bar of the Philippines (IBP), like I guess all of the lawyers in this room, a pleasant afternoon to you, especially to those in good standing. So recently there was a new committee formed in the IBP. It is a small committee composed of eleven members and right now there are eight members, so I am very honored to lead the team of IBP International Law and International Affairs Committee (ILIAC). With me here is also a member of the committee from Western Visayas, Dean Villasor. Please stand. We also have with us, we are very honored that he has accepted the position of advisor emeritus of the IBP committee, Dean Merlin Magallona. He already has prior information about his appointment. He was not surprised.

The IBP Committee is a new committee of the IBP. The idea really is to support IBP members. IBP members, in their practice of law, usually focus on applying Philippine Law. But we know that in their practice, more and more, they are confronting international law issues, and foreign law issues. So the primary purpose really of the Committee is to support IBP members in their practice of law. The objective of IBP is to enhance the standard of the legal profession so we hope to assist the IBP in meeting that objective. The second purpose of the Committee is actually to help our Overseas Filipino Workers (OFWs). So that accounts for the international affairs portion of the Committee name. The Committee is named International Law and International Affairs Committee. For international affairs, the purpose really is to assist OFWs in availing of legal aid by foreign lawyers.

What we are doing in the Committee is we are networking with foreign bar associations, we are networking with international law organizations, trying to get them to agree to provide a special facility for OFWs in their home country. We know that the DFA has a special office for migrant workers and that they have consuls in the embassies who are really assisting nationals, but we also know that they are saddled with a lot of work, so we hope to complement the great work that the DFA is doing by tapping these foreign lawyers who are based in those countries to assist our OFWs.

The first task is really to assist IBP members in practice of law using international law and foreign law. Second, is to help OFWs avail of legal aid by foreign lawyers. The third purpose of the Committee is really to advocate for public interest. I realize that we should also highlight this important aspect of the Committee based on my preliminary discussion with Asec. Ed. He attended the first activity of the Committee and we had a meeting on the sidelines of the conference. And he shared the vision of DFA to engage, really, with the stakeholders in the Philippines.

So, in behalf of the Committee and the IBP, we are very happy to announce that we support the DFA in its efforts to create this body, this support group of stakeholders who will help advocate for the adoption of international agreements and the implementation of international agreements. We will take a close look at the list of international agreements that were mentioned previously by the panels and we will determine which ones the IBP can support and advocate for adoption, either by the executive or a concurrence by the Senate and even in the implementation of these international agreements. We respond to this call by Ambassador Ed and we will assure you of our continued support.

Now what are the activities of the Committee? We are trying to do one activity per month so it is a bit hectic for us. The first activity was the Philippines – Japan Law Conference. The topic was foreign law issues involving family law – Japanese divorce, recognition in the Philippines, and the establishment of paternity of Japanese-Filipino children. The second activity will be on December 11. It will be to commemorate Human Rights Day and we have invited the Commission on Human Rights, as well as the Philippine Association of Law Schools for this December 11 activity at IBP. In January, the committee will be assisting the IBP in its major activity called the meeting of the house of delegates. The topic will be West Philippine Sea. And so the Committee will be assisting in forming panels for the house of delegates. In February, the Committee will be supporting the annual Jessup Moot Court Competition hosted by University of Santo Tomas (UST). In March, the idea is to have the Convention on the UN Convention Against Corruption which was originally proposed by Dean Magallona. So the idea is to have it in March. No activity yet for April, but in May, we plan to offer a certification course for those interested in Public International Law, particularly those who are teaching Public International Law in the law schools. So it will be a certification course. It will be handled by Prof. Ricky dela Cruz of UST and Prof. Joan de Venecia of University of the Philippines. There are other activities after May and we will be announcing them in our Facebook.

So again, the purpose really is to introduce to you this revived Committee in the IBP which aims to help IBP members use international law and foreign law in their private practice. Thank you very much.

ATTY. CEMBRANO-MALLARI: Next, we have Atty. Jeremy Gatdula from University of Asia and the Pacific to discuss the work of the Philippine Council on Foreign Relations. If I may mention, he has a book that has just been published. It is called The Outline Introduction to Public International Law. This is co-authored with Justice Antonio Nachura.

UPDATES: PHILIPPINE COUNCIL FOR FOREIGN RELATIONS

ATTY. JEREMY GATDULA: I was not expecting the endorsement, but thank you very much.

It just occurred to me that we are coming at a time when there is a big interest as far as public international concern. The timing is actually quite, in a way, coincidental. So we have the Philippine Institute for International Law and then the revived Committee in the IBP. It is the same story with the Philippine Council for Foreign Relations (PCFR).

In the 80's, the Council had amongst its members, Vice President Emanuel Pelaez, Justice Jorge Coquia was there as well, Teodoro Valencia was part of it, Ambassador Enrique Syquia, and a host of other people. Florentino Feliciano was also part of the group. And sometime in 2013/2014, Ambassador Jose Romero, formerly Ambassador for Rome, wanted to revive the PCFR and with great energy, he did so. The idea about the PCFR is that, if you heard the names mentioned earlier, the members come from a variety of disciplines. You have people who are from the academe, people from the military, people from business and the practice of law. And so it gave, or it seeks to give, the sort of advice from different kinds of sources in the formulation of Philippine Policy.

And so that is what we have been doing right now for the past three years. We have defined our organization in trying to give to formal and informal channels, at least different kinds of insight to Philippine policy in national security, defense, and all those other issues that have become important for the Philippines.

Actually, as far as the PCFR is concerned, that is essentially all I could say. Ambassador Romero would be happy to discuss if invited for these things, Ambassador Bautista is also a member and we have had our friends come over. Ambassador Teehankee before would come over and give us talks. The membership here tends to be on a by-invitation basis but we do have events that are open to the public.

Having said that, and again thank you very much for inviting me here, I would like to, at least veer away a little bit from the program and just give some of my personal insights on these things coming off from my own personal experience.

It is great that we are reviving interest in public international law and I think it is great that we are encouraging more people to be thinking about public international law. But I think one thing that we also have to remember is that like domestic law, Philippine international law has a philosophical component or angle. It is not a neutral thing.

People do make use of Public International Law to advance a policy agenda, whether you have gender issues, the economy, immigration, or national security. We should be aware of that, I am not saying it is a good thing, I am not saying it is a bad thing. The point is to be aware of the fact that there are ideological bents in the advancement of international law.

Which leads me to this one thing, I hope I am not overstaying my stay, I will not keep this long. Please do forgive me, but I think somebody has to say it. For lack of an elegant phrasing, not every treaty has to be signed.

Not every treaty has to be entered into by the Philippine government.

Perhaps there are instances when the treaty need not be signed.

Perhaps there are instances when the Philippines should step back and see that perhaps our own domestic law is far superior to international law.

And I have seen that actually. For example, in terms of human rights, and in terms of other areas wherein our own laws, if applied properly, are actually far more superior than what international law is.

There has always been an attempt by certain quarters, for example, to use international law as a way to circumvent Philippine democracy, rather than using Congress to implement policy measures. They enter the Philippines into a treaty to be able to get around the legislative difficulties of enacting a measure unacceptable to the Filipino or contradicts his values.

I think it is something that we need to be aware of, that perhaps instead of using an external tool like public international law to shape Philippine society, we ought to shape Philippine society itself internally and then very actively move to shape that external tool, not the other way around.

That's it and I hope I have not offended too many people by that, but thank you very much indeed. It is something that I felt should be mentioned and something that I hope would be helpful in the years to come as far as our gatherings are concerned. Thank you very much.

ATTY. CEMBRANO-MALLARI: Thank you very much, Prof. Gatdula. Thank you very much gentlemen for introducing your respective institutions.

SESSION 3: LUNCHEON ADDRESS

ATTY. CEMBRANO-MALLARI: We have now come to the last, but certainly not the least significant part of our program. We are honored to have with us an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, a highly respected legal scholar, and advocate of civil liberties, Associate Justice Marvic Mario Victor F. Leonen. Let me introduce him to you briefly. Before joining the Supreme Court, Justice Leonen has had a long track record in public service, whether in or outside of government. Even before becoming a lawyer, this dedicated son of Baguio co-founded the Legal Rights and Natural Resources Center Inc. and Kasama Sa Kalikasan, a legal and policy research institution advocating the rights of long-term upland communities composed of mostly farmers and indigenous peoples. He has served on the boards of many other non-government organizations, including Health Justice Philippines, and has been a member of the Free Legal Assistance Group or FLAG, a group of human rights lawyers since 1987. He was a member of the U.P. Law faculty and was later invited to act as General Counsel for the U.P. System, as well as its first Vice-President for Legal Affairs in 2005. He became the Dean of the U.P. College of Law in 2008.

He first appeared before the Supreme Court, defending the constitutionality of the Indigenous Peoples Rights Act, arguing against former Supreme Court Justice Isagani Cruz. He also served as the lead counsel in the case of La Bugal-B'Laan Tribal Association vs. Ramos,²⁰ which questioned the Mining Act of 1995. While serving as Dean of U.P. College of Law, he was appointed by President Aquino as chief negotiator for the government in peace talks with the Moro Islamic Liberation Front in 2010, which led to the signing of the framework agreement on the Bangsamoro, a historic milestone in the peace negotiations with the rebel group. In November 2012, he was appointed to the Supreme Court by President Aquino, becoming the youngest Supreme Court justice to be appointed in this century, set to serve the Philippine Supreme Court for 21 years. Justice Leonen received his Bachelor's Degree in Economics, with Magna Cum Laude honors, and his Juris Doctors degree from University of the Philippines. He received his Master's Degree in Law from Columbia University in New York. Ladies and gentlemen, colleagues, here to deliver the keynote address, please join us in welcoming Honorable Marvic Mario Victor F. Leonen, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court.

ADDRESS ON
INVISIBLE PEOPLES IN INTERNATIONAL LAW:
PROLEGOMENA TO DISCERN THE FUTURE OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

MARVIC M.V.F. LEONEN: Thank you again for the privilege to address your colloquium.

Partnerships between the Department of Foreign Affairs, through its many offices including the Foreign Service Institute, and the UP College of Law Complex through its Institute for International Legal Studies have always been, in the past, productive, creative and—on occasion—strategically provocative. This is rightly so since the world of practice exemplified by the diplomats of the Department of Foreign Affairs is always in a dialectical relationship with the
